have been the act of Henry's father, Geoffrey. The evidence upon which Brunner relied to prove that this was originally done by Henry and that it was accomplished by a single ordinance (assisa) is found not to prove the point. But procedure by sworn inquest, introduced by the Normans in England soon after 1066, appears first to have been extended generally to the ordinary litigant by Henry II in Normandy, and the process was probably furthered by legislative enactment. Thus, to quote the author, "Where Normandy sowed, England and all English-speaking lands were to reap."

W. A. Morris.
